

OFFICIAL RECORD OF THE SURRENDER OF THE GERMAN FLEET.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE ROYAL NAVY.

PUBLISHED WITH THE AUTHORITY OF THE ADMIRALTY BY MESSRS
HODDER AND STOUGHTON.

Price
2/6 net.

PUBLISHED WITH THE AUTHORITY OF THE ADMIRALTY
BY HODDER AND STOUGHTON, LONDON, NEW YORK, TORONTO.

OFFICIAL RECORD OF THE SURRENDER OF THE GERMAN

THE TRIUMPH OF THE ROYAL NAVY.

PUBLISHED WITH THE AUTHORITY OF THE ADMIRALTY
BY HODDER AND STOUGHTON, LONDON, NEW YORK, TORONTO.

W. H. ...
3 The Abbey ...
...

THE TRIUMPH OF THE ROYAL NAVY

HOW THE GERMAN FLEET CAME TO BRITAIN.

By Major PERCEVAL GIBBON, Royal Marines.

HERE came a time, during the great weeks in November, when to those in the Grand Fleet it seemed that events trod too rapidly upon one another's heels; when, before one's mind could rise to the full sense and significance of one world-changing event, another had come up to obscure it. A new, strange glamour had entered into life—the glamour of victory; and since the signal had been made that hostilities had ceased, it had been difficult to be sure of seeing anything in its just proportion.

First there was the night of the Armistice, when, for an hour, the Fleet broke into a frenzy of rejoicing and celebration, with the sirens screaming at each other across the misty waters, the great arms of the searchlights waving insanely, and the coloured fires of the Vêry lights raining down like iridescent snow. Then, from the North Sea, where no German ship may move save by our leave, there came the Albatross, bringing Rear-Admiral Meurer and

H.M.S. "CARDIFF," WITH OBSERVATION BALLOON, LEADING THE GERMAN LINE:
THE BATTLE-CRUISER "SEYDLITZ" IN THE FOREGROUND.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

THE NEW "VINDICTIVE," SHOWING THE PLATFORM FOR LAUNCHING AEROPLANES.

his four German officers to the conference aboard the Queen Elizabeth; then bay departure, and finally, upon the morning of November 21, that sea-pageant that so transcended all hopes and beliefs—the surrender intact of the best part of the German Navy. Within the space of ten days, all for which the British Navy works, fights, and exists had been poured out upon it in a bewildering deluge of victory.

THE COMING OF THE KÖNIGSBERG.

And the strangeness of it all was enhanced by the setting in which the great world-drama was developed to its unforgettable climax. Mist, the winter mist of Scotland, drifted and

H.M.S. "ARGUS"; AN AEROPLANE-SHIP.

All top hanger is sacrificed to the necessity of giving a clear landing-place for aeroplanes. The winging-bridge is raised to the upper deck by means of a lift from below, where it is housed when flying is in progress.

ADMIRAL SIR DAVID BEATTY VIEWS THE SURRENDER SCENE FROM HIS FLAG-SHIP, H.M.S. "QUEEN ELIZABETH."

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

settled like a spirit moving upon the waters; the fighting-ships that inhabit the Forth loomed up and vanished again in the shifting obscurity of it; and when, upon the morning of November 15, Rear-Admiral Sinclair went out with his light-cruiser squadron to meet the Königsberg and bring her in to her anchorage, the ships groped seaward through a white night of fog till the booms were passed and the mist thinned as the Firth widened into the North Sea.

There were six cruisers in the squadron, and with them were ten destroyers to aid in picking the German ship up and shepherding her in. They strewed themselves abroad over the calm surface of the water, stretching in a long line abreast that disappeared in the vagueness of the horizon. The Königsberg had been given a course which should bring her to the rendezvous at two p.m., but already during the morning the Cardiff, the Rear-Admiral's

BRITISH CRUISERS ARRIVING AT THE RENDEZVOUS IN THE NORTH SEA.
H.M.S. "Lion," H.M.S. "Princess Royal," and H.M.S. "Tiger."

flag-ship, was in touch with her by wireless, receiving her explanations as to why she had varied the appointed course, and how, in one instance, she had made a détour about a German mine-field which our ships had long since swept up. There was ground for a little anxiety lest, in that dimness of mist which encircled the sea, the British ships should miss her as she stood in towards the mouth of the Firth, and that she might attempt the entrance unescorted.

THE WHITE FLAG OF GERMANY.

It was at 2.20 p.m. precisely that the ships, having patrolled the neighbourhood of the meeting-point for half an hour, picked her up. First a blur in the haze to windward as she appeared out of the south; then a ship-form growing into distinctness as she neared; and at last the shape of a long, light-painted cruiser, her sharp bow sheering through the water with scarcely a bow-wave. Her searchlight showed an unwinking white eye in token of the

H.M.S. "HERCULES," THE FLAG-SHIP OF SIR MONTAGUE BROWNING, LEADING THE 4th BATTLE SQUADRON TO MEET THE GERMANS.

The ships are: "Neptune," "St. Vincent," "Colossus," and "Bellona."

THE GRAND FLEET STREAMING UNDER THE FORTH BRIDGE.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

fact that she received and understood our signals; and, as she came round to fall into station astern of the British flag-ship, there was clear to see, at the head of her lofty mainmast, the white flag by which she was to be recognised. At her fore flew the flag of Rear-Admiral Meurer, and at her peak was the Imperial Ensign which is—which was—Germany's standard upon the seas. And somehow she managed to convey to those who watched a sense of surrender and the humiliation of defeat. Her guns were screened under canvas covers; and, as she carried out the signalled orders and submitted her own Morse call-sign, she suggested something like the resignation and helpless submission of a prisoner of war.

Upon her lower bridge it was possible, with the glasses, to make out the row of black hats of a number of civilians, probably members of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council who were known to be accompanying the Rear-Admiral. No British officer has yet had the means of learning what shame and bitterness must have filled the hearts of those German officers who brought over for surrender the honour of their Service and the future of their great Navy, under the surveillance and control of the representatives of the men whose mutiny made impossible the final battle in which at least the ships might have gone down with their flags flying.

BRITISH BATTLE-SHIPS IN LINE ARRIVING AT THE NORTH SEA RENDEZVOUS, LED BY THE "QUEEN ELIZABETH."

THE HIDDEN FLEET.

It was dark by the time she was berthed off Inchkeith, with the guardian motor-launches circling about her to prevent communication with the shore, and the cruisers and destroyers of her escort lying around her. The fog had thinned a little with the evening; the darkness

VIEW FROM H.M.S. "HERCULES"; H.M.S. "HERCULES" LEADING THE 4TH BATTLE SQUADRON OUT TO SEA.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

upon the Firth was freckled with the lights of the ships. It was all that the Germans saw of that great revelation of sea-power, for they made their passage up-stream to the Queen Elizabeth in the ward-room of the destroyer Oak; they moved in the presence of the mightiest factor for peace, the most potent argument against Germany's claims to dominion that the world has known; ships undreamed of were all around them and hidden from them.

The conference that took place that night was brief, and concerned itself merely with preliminaries. But from the moment of the arrival alongside the Queen Elizabeth of the German officers, the note was struck that governed the proceedings and the relations of the parties. As a naval officer of flag rank, the German plenipotentiary was entitled by the custom of Navies to be received with a certain ceremony; as an enemy, still at war, he was entitled to nothing else. Therefore, while yet the picket-boat that carried the Germans from the Oak was still at the foot of the ladder, the line of Royal Marines which extended across the deck from the head of the gangway to the hatch was already standing to attention; it was not a guard of honour and there was no presenting arms. The quartermaster of the watch blew the thin regulation pipe-whistle as the officers came up the ladder; the officer of the watch received them with the due salute. Rear-Admiral Meurer, halting with clicked heels, facing the British officer and the great bulk of the after-turrets, saluted in return. The Captain of the Fleet, Commodore Brand, and the Captain of the ship, were also present and escorted the Germans to the hatch.

H.M.S. "QUEEN ELIZABETH" AT THE SURRENDER OF THE GERMAN FLEET.

ON BOARD THE BRITISH FLAG-SHIP.

The conference proper took place the following day. The fog had so thickened during the night that it was not till noon that the Oak could bring her passengers to the flag-ship. Admiral Beatty was assisted by Admiral Sir Charles E. Madden, second in command of the Grand Fleet, and by Vice-Admiral Sir O. de B. Brock, the Chief of Staff. Vice-Admiral

THE 4TH BATTLE SQUADRON PUTTING TO SEA: H.M.S. "NEPTUNE," H.M.S. "ST. VINCENT,"
H.M.S. "COLOSSUS," AND H.M.S. "ELLERBOPHON."

REAR-ADMIRAL SINCLAIR'S LIGHT CRUISERS PUTTING TO SEA TO MEET THE GERMANS.

GERMAN BATTLE-CRUISERS ARRIVING AT THE FORTH: "SEYDLITZ" LEADING, FOLLOWED BY "MOLTKE" AND "HINDENBURG."

Sir Montague E. Browning took part at certain stages, and Rear-Admiral Sir Reginald Tyrwhitt had come up in his flag-ship from Harwich with regard to the surrender of the submarines. Rear-Admiral Meurer had with him three officers, besides his personal aide-de-camp.

All day long the fog held and the great floating towas of the fleet waited for the news. None came; even now the story has not yet been made public of what happened in the big sters cabin of the flag-ship, where Admiral Beatty sat under the portrait of Nelson with the model of the Lion on the table before him, with the grey-bearded Admiral of a beaten enemy facing him; while one by one, like counters in a game, the battle-ships, the

GERMAN BATTLE-CRUISERS LED BY "SEYDLITZ."

H.M.S. "CARDIFF" LEADING THE "KÖNIGSBERG," WITH ADMIRAL MEYER ON BOARD ON HIS RETURN TO GERMANY AFTER THE ARMISTICE CONFERENCE.

The "Königsberg" is the second ship in the line.

GERMAN LIGHT CRUISERS STEAMING TO THE FORTS.

GERMAN LIGHT CRUISERS IN LINE.

The two nearest vessels are the "Brunnen" and "Rosmar," two fast mine-laying light cruisers built along the outbreak of war.

cruisers, the destroyers and submarines of the Power that looked forward to a "future on the sea," passed from the hands of the one to the sure hold of the other. It is said—but corroboration is lacking—that what the Germans found to be the decisive factor in the situation was the blockade, and that Admiral Meurer made a moving and personal appeal for its relaxation during the Armistice.

It was ten o'clock at night when at last the proceedings were over and the German officers left the ship. Along the rail of the quarterdeck and the gangway, clusters of electric lights had been turned on, and these made a space of radiance, walled in by the dense unshifting fog. Upon the superstructure there showed the dark mass of a silent, watching crowd of bluejackets. The picket-boat that waited alongside slid to the foot of the ladder; and forth from the hatch, Rear-Admiral Meurer leading, came the German officers. One had not looked to see in them any outward token of the fate of the negotiations, nor of their feelings; yet as the Rear-Admiral turned at the gangway to salute, it was difficult not to perceive or to imagine in him the outward signs and stigma of defeat. A man of barely the middle stature, blue-cloaked to the heels, with the end of a scabbard appearing below the hem of the cloak, he showed beneath the deep peak of his gold-laced cap a smallish face, trimly grey-bearded, and composed to a stony and death-like rigidity. Once again he raised his hand in salute, and saw about him that trim vista of fighting power, the throng of the gazing sailors, the wide spaces of the deck, the immensity of the huge guns. The quartermaster shrilled upon his pipe; he turned, bent his head, and carrying it bowed upon his breast, he passed down the side, and so to the darkness of the night and of his thoughts. From the sailors who watched, there was not a word, not a sound.

II.

"OPERATION ZZ."

In the Navy, nothing is without meaning and purpose; and the letters "ZZ" which distinguished the operation orders for the reception and guarding of the German ships which were surrendered for internment on November 21st, are packed with meaning like an epigram. They express finality; for though the Armistice is only a suspension of hostilities, and the enemy war-ships are not formally surrendered but only handed over for internment, yet the Navy knows, as surely all the world knows, that the war is won and over; that a maritime Power which would or could deliver up its ships to an enemy is a Power no longer; and that the seas are again free and open. "ZZ" is Navy for "Nunc dimittis."

The orders were full and detailed. The Fleet was to unmoor and go to sea before dawn, the light cruiser Cordiff, towing a kite-balloon, going ahead to guide the German ships to the rendezvous with the Grand Fleet. Our ships would proceed in two lines, so as to pass the Germans on either hand till our leading light cruisers were abreast of their light cruisers:

THE GERMAN BATTLE-FLEET STREAMING TO THE RENDEZVOUS IN THE NORTH SEA.

BRITISH WAR-SHIPS FOLLOWING H.M.S. "QUEEN ELIZABETH";

ON THE RIGHT IS THE "OAK," ADMIRAL BEATTY'S DESTROYER.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

then we were to turn and accompany them in. They were complete to the last signal to be made and the last knot of speed; they were permeated with the assumption, confident and secure, that all would go like clockwork, that nothing would happen that was not ordained by the Commander-in-Chief; and yet, to the last moment, even when the leading Germans began to show like ship-ghosts in the far haze where the Cardiff's kite-balloon moved like a drifting bubble, there were men and officers by the thousand who said, incredulously: "Now they'll fire; they're bound to! They can never stand this!"

THE PAGEANT OF SEA-POWER.

There was a light whip of wind that moved the haze without dispersing it, and the sea was easy. A naval dirigible or two cruised above the heads of the ships, and a covey of aeroplanes whirred in the distance. When daylight had established itself, those in the ships beheld such a spectacle as the world and its history cannot rival. The Fleet as it lies in the Firth, extended in ranks and tiers of mountainous great battle-ships, island-like battle-cruisers, light cruisers and destroyers past counting, is portentous enough in size and multitude; but it is at sea, peopling the great water-floors from horizon to horizon, with the smoke rising upon the skyline of ships yet unseen, possessing the ocean as an army possesses a province—it is only thus that one can gain a just impression of what the Navy of Britain has become with four years of war.

THE BATTLE-CRUISER "MOLTKE," A SISTER-SHIP TO THE "GOEBEN," OF TURKISH FAME, DISPLACING 22,600 TONS, AND CARRYING TEN 11-IN. GUNS.

Upon the high-navigating bridges of the leading light cruisers keen eyes were peering through glasses. The Cardiff had reported by wireless when she picked up the Germans, and

THE GERMAN BATTLE-CRUISER "HINDENBURG."

The completion of this vessel was considerably delayed owing to her materials being used to repair some of the damage which the German "victory" at Jutland did to their ships. She displaces 27,000 tons, and is of our "Tiger" type, but only carrying eight 12-in. guns. Note the tripod mast, which was introduced after Jutland.

THE BATTLE-SHIP "FRIEDRICH DER GROSSE"; FLAG-SHIP IN THE IGNORABLE LAST CRUISE OF THE MIGHTY GERMAN NAVY.

She displaces 28,000 tons, and carries ten 12-in. guns—a copy of our "Negress."

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

now, three miles off, at about the extreme limit of vision that morning, her balloon was plain to see. There was a hint of sun somewhere above the mist, and presently its rays seemed to touch a far-off point in the haze where something wraith-like and paler than the mist moved astern of the balloon. At the guns and along the decks, where the crew stood to their fighting stations in gas-masks and life-belts, there was a rustle of excitement. "It's them," ran from mouth to mouth. "Will they open fire?"

"THEM."

It was "them"! First went the Cardiff, looking very little by contrast with the great sui that followed obediently behind her. And astern of her there stole into view, crawling in at the ordained ten knots, their light paint showing a little ghostly in the baffled sunshine, a string of giant shapes of ships. There is always in the movement of a distant ship the effect of something alive and conscious, walking the waters by her own volition; and these, the towering giants with their world-challenging armament, instruments of battle framed for nothing but to meet the British Navy in action, gave one now the sense of a string of slaves, of beaten and humbled slaves. So might the deported inhabitants of some conquered district affect an onlooker, as they were driven rearwards along the war-congested roads to the purgatory prepared for them.

THE GERMAN BATTLE-CRUISER "SEYDLITZ," FLAG-SHIP DURING THE RAIDS ON OPEN TOWNS ON THE EAST COAST IN THE EARLY PART OF THE WAR.

It needed memories such as these—recollections of the torpedoings and deep-sea murders which are the whole of Germany's naval record—to restrain one from pity. There were officers in our ships who looked first with blank amazement and then with real horror at that spectacle of sound ships, every one governed by men of their own trade engaged in the service of their country's dishonour.

"Why didn't they come out and make us sink 'em in a last fight?" they asked. "Or blow them up themselves—or at least sink them at their moorings?"

But—not a shot, not a ship that wavered from the precise orders laid down for her by the Commander-in-Chief. Germany's "Day" had come and gone. By three in the afternoon, they were all moored in the Firth, and the Queen Elizabeth had returned to her moorings far up stream, beyond the great bridge, steaming through a lane of ships whence the cheers of the crews saluted the Admiral.

THE BATTLE-CRUISER "VON DER TANN."

The first German battle-cruiser of our "Indefatigable" type. She was very badly damaged at the Dogger Bank and Jutland. She was present at the Spithead Review in 1912, and took part in the bombardment of Scarborough.

III.

THE EMDEN FROM WITHIN.

Towards evening, the lead-grey mists which drifted in the Firth of Forth took colour from the subsiding sun, and from the level of the picket-boat which carried the search-party

THE BATTLESHIP "KRONPRINZ WILHELM," FOLLOWED BY THE "MARKGRAF."

This vessel was originally known as the "Kronprinz"; but when German hopes were raised during 1915 by the progress of the army of the Crown Prince on the Champs des Dunes, she was renamed "Kronprinz Wilhelm."

across the dully-shining floor of water to the German light cruiser London, the great city of ships which lay at anchor to the south-west of May Island was transfigured in the sunset flash, and to the glory of the event was added a glamour of beauty and strangeness.

There was the quality of a mirage in the scene, its marvel and its unreality. The ships stood upon the lary sea like an idle population—great battle-ships, grotesquely vast battle-cruisers, and smaller ships beyond counting; and among them, like a leaven, flavouring them with victory and making them purposeful with achievement, lay the German ships. To the onlooker it was as if all were shut together into the privacy of a great chamber, walled about and over-roofed by the shifting architecture of the sunset-flushed mist that gave them not only a background, but an atmosphere. The mist-wreaths, drifting and sun-tinged, floated through them and about them, so that at one instant they were stark and black to see, and at the next they were vague and spectral. And, since most eyes were for those melancholy guests, the German ships which the Fleet had met, at sea that morning and shepherded to the anchorage that afternoon, the thought was irresistible that here one beheld, not mere things of steel, but things of dream—the frustrate ghosts of a dead Navy.

A LIGHT CRUISER OF THE "KÖNIGSBERG" TYPE.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

THE LAST OF THE GERMAN ENSIGN.

The sun, at four o'clock in the afternoon, was a red-hot iron ball in a cold leaden sky, scarce spilling his sunset fires about him. The occupants of the picket-boat, tiny in that glassy immensity, gazing fixed and fascinated while the little craft fussed and throbbed through the water, saw upon a moment the German ensigns slide from the peaks of their ships. It was four o'clock in the afternoon of the 21st November; it was an hour as significant for the future and for the security of humanity and civilisation as that early morning hour of the 11th November, when the German delegates at General Foch's headquarters signed their names to the terms of the Armistice: for they merely implied a promise of surrender, and here was surrender itself—if not in name, yet in the irrefragable act of a great and beaten Navy. The German Imperial Ensign was lowered to the order of a British Admiral, not to be hoisted again without his orders.

THE GERMAN CRUISER "KÖNIGSBERG."

The Endow's ladder was down, and there were men in uniform loafing about the deck at the head of it, but no officers to receive the search-party. The Commander in charge of the

A BATTLE-SHIP OF-THE "KAISER" CLASS.

Showing the ugly thick foremast tried by the Germans before adopting the tripod mast, which was objected to as being an invention of the "rednecked Englishmen."

THE BATTLE-SHIP "MAREGRAF."

A sail of the "Edwig" alone, the most powerful battle-ship of the German Navy until the "Bayern" arrived with her 15-in. guns. The thick foremast was substituted for the former light pole-masts instead of a tripod, as this was considered to be "one mark of enemy origin."

"FLAGSHIPS THREE
The U.S. Flagship "New York" coming up astern of H.M.S. "Queen Elizabeth," with the

AG-SHIPS THREE."

Elizabeth," with the German flag-ship "Friedrich der Grosse" passing on the port bow.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

party went up the ship's side, followed by the Marine officer charged with the duty of interpreter; the remainder came after. No one received them. Forward, men of the cruiser's crew stood in groups, staring; aft, her decks beside the superstructure, built wide for the stowage of mines, were vacant. There was a moment of waiting. Then, from a door in the deck-house, where her officers are housed, appeared the Commander of the ship (Korvetten-Kapitän).

THE EMDEN'S OFFICERS.

He saluted; his salute, according to orders and to the Navy's handsome custom, was returned.

GERMAN DESTROYERS OF THE 1250-TON TYPE.

He was a small man, blonde as new straw, meagre-faced, iron-lipped, and perhaps thirty years of age—a Prussian, as it afterwards appeared. He was neat and correct as a new doll; at the level of the second button of his monkey-jacket he wore the Iron Cross—black, with silvered edges; and he had armour-plated whatever his personal feelings may have been with a chill and impregnable formality of manner and demeanour, so narrowly limited to the matter in hand, so restricted to the minimum of the forms of official courtesy, that he made something of the effect of an ingenious automaton.

"You wish to see the Captain?" he enquired, and, receiving his answer, turned and led the way into the deck-house.

The Emden is fitted for an Admiral as squadron-leader, and the Captain's day-cabin was a spacious room the full width of the superstructure, white-painted, with white-enamelled furniture and large square windows on either side. Under the clock upon one side was a large photograph of the Kaiser as Admiral, and upon another side hung an exquisite little oil painting, with an indecipherable signature, of the battle between the Eosée (the earlier Eosée which the present one was built to replace) and H. M. S. Sydney. A coffee service, but no coffee, was arranged on a side table, and the whole room gave the impression of a handsome and comfortable apartment from which much in the way of personal possessions and the accoutrements of usual life had recently been removed. Upon the entrance of the Commander in charge of the search-party and the interpreter, Fregatten-Kapitän Becker, commanding the ship, rose from his seat by the table to receive them.

A BRITISH AIR-SHIP FLYING OVER THE GERMAN FLEET IN THE NORTH SEA.

BRITISH AND GERMAN DESTROYERS AT ANCHOR OFF INCHEKEITH AT SUNSET; OUR "V" AND "W" CLASS BOATS IN THE FOREGROUND.

Every officer who assisted in the search of the German ships has in memory that first awkward and embarrassing moment, when, with the fact newly impressed upon him by his orders that he was dealing with an enemy still at war, an enemy with the character and record of the German, he beheld an officer humbled and powerless, a beaten and degraded man, precariously mounted upon the ruins of his official dignity and the débris of the prestige of his caste. British officers, by order of the Commander-in-Chief, were warned against all actions that might compromise them and their Service; they were to avoid or evade such gestures as handshakes, to decline refreshments and cigarettes, and generally to abstain from any actions or concessions that would or could imply fraternisation with the Germans. And it is the due of the Navy to place on record that in the fulfilment of functions that were difficult at the best and painful at the worst, the British officers showed a tact, an impersonality, and a restraint which are beyond all praise.

Captain Becker, of the Emden, had commanded the ship for only four weeks; he had brought her across with a skeleton crew of 284 men as against her normal complement of something over five hundred; and this voyage, to surrender her for internment, was the first time he had taken her to sea. He appeared as a man of about forty, large, dark, and serious. He acknowledged briefly the orders given him regarding his anchors and the lights to be shown, and placed guides at the disposal of the search-party to conduct them through the ship.

SOVIETS IN THE SHIPS.

The Emden, like all the other ships, had scrupulously complied with the requirements enunciated by Admiral Beatty. She had been emptied of explosives to the last shell-case and detonator; her magazines, in which shells and charges were stowed together instead of, as in the British practice, in separate stores, were utterly empty; the breech-blocks of her guns and the sights had also been removed, though her range-finders and control-gear had been left in position. Her internal sub-division was exceedingly elaborate, according to the German use which makes their ships so difficult to sink by torpedo attack, and the officers of the search-party speak highly of her general arrangements.

THE BRITISH FLEET AT SUNRISE, AS SEEN FROM THE DECK OF H.M.S. "QUEEN ELIZABETH."

In the foreground are our latest battle-ships of the "Royal Sovereign" type.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

Her men seemed sufficiently fed and well-enough dressed. They varied in physical quality from sturdy bluejackets to the veriest weeds, and there was a like divergence in their demeanour. While some were sailorly and decent enough, there were others who seemed to be at pains to preserve a manner of affront towards the officers of the ship, who would answer them without removing their cigarettes, and even pointedly salute the British officers while ignoring the presence of their own superiors. The battle-ship Bayern was actually controlled by a council of six lower-deck ratings, and her Captain was watched by a sentry and fed upon strictly apportioned rations. His midday meal, for example, was scheduled to consist of a piece of meat and four potatoes. In another ship, the Captain rang for his messenger and asked if certain lists were yet made out for delivery to British officers. "Wie kann ich wissen?" replied the man contemptuously—"How can I know?" and turned his back and left the cabin. The Captain had to go out and make his enquiry himself.

GERMAN DESTROYERS.

These are the 1250-ton three-funnelled Smilke leaders, of which the German Navy possesses about ten. The first four of this type were building in Germany for Argentina, and were seized at the outbreak of war.

"I DON'T KNOW."

Many of the officers made attempts to gain information from members of the search-parties. "I really don't know," was the answer most commonly employed; but their queries none the less gave an index to the direction of their chief anxieties. One officer employed as

EVENING: THE GERMAN DESTROYERS IN LINE FORMATION, ESCORTED BY BRITISH DESTROYERS IN THE GREY DISTANCE.

THE END OF THE GERMAN DESTROYER FLOTILLAS: SOME OF THE FIFTY SURRENDERED BOATS STEAMING IN LINE TO INCHKEITH.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

A LARGE CRUISER U-BOAT, OF THE SAME TYPE AS THE "DEUTSCHLAND," LEAVING THE LINE OF U-BOATS.

interpreter was sent back upon a German ship late at night to fetch certain documents. They were not completed, and he found himself seated before a table in the Captain's cabin, with forty minutes to wait and nothing to say—according to order. Wine and cigarettes were offered to him and declined. Then—

"Have you any news as to whether the peace negotiations have started?" enquired the German Captain.

"I really don't know," was the reply

THE "DEUTSCHLAND" BETWEEN TWO OTHER SUBMARINES OF HER CLASS.

THE THANKSGIVING SERVICE HELD ON BOARD H.M.S. "QUEEN ELIZABETH"
AFTER THE GERMAN NAVAL SURRENDER.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

A posse, while the Captain examined him with sad, suspicious eyes, and he stared uncomfortably at the big photograph of the Kaiser.

"There's no reason for delaying them," said the Captain. "We've got to accept your terms, even if you make them as hard as the Armistice. We are defenceless (totráis) now, and everybody in Germany has gone mad. Do you think this ir^oament will last long?"

"Can't say, I'm sure."

The detailed search upon the following morning took some hours, and was conducted without incident everywhere. The first visit of the British officers seemed in some measure

THE CONNING-TOWER OF A MODERN SUBMARINE.

Showing the "jumping wires" designed to carry men and other obstructions clear of the vessel. The mast, periscopes, and engine staff are, of course, all lowered below the level of the wires.

to have relieved the Germans of their fears of bad or humiliating treatment, and the party that again inspected and searched the Endeavour was piped up her side and received on deck by the Commander with all the due forms. Gunnery, torpedo, and engine-room parties were taken on board this time, and the cruiser was scrutinised from end to end exhaustively by our experts. German warrant officers and seamen were put at their disposal as guides; and save for the double bottoms, about which special orders had been issued, every recess of the ship, every locker and stow-room, was opened up. It was noteworthy that a number of the German seamen who guided our men had obliterated from their cap-ribbons the letters "S.M.S." (Seine Majestät's Schiff). The whole of the lower deck was apparently ready to fraternise if they had been allowed to do so, but our men, taking the cue from their officers, were rigidly business-like and intent only on the matter in hand. Some of the men stated afterwards that they had seen notices hanging here and there commencing "Kamerades!" and that among the Easles's crew were sailors distinguished by red-and-white armlets, supposedly the members of the ship's Soviet.

VIEW SHOWING A PORTION OF A SURRENDERED U-BOAT.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

THE FATE OF THE SHIPS.

Several officers in charge of search-parties report that the German officers enquired to confide their troubles to them. "I am detaining you," said one Commander to a German

A CLOSE-UP VIEW OF THE SURRENDERED U-BOATS, SHOWING SOME OF THE CREWS ON DECK.

Captain; "no doubt you have things to do." The German shook his head sadly. "There is nothing for me to do now," he lamented, "except to think, and my thoughts are not pleasant ones." Many German officers seemed to take it for granted that the ships would return to Germany after the Armistice. They were all convinced that they were to be sent to Scapa Flow for internment—whither, as a matter of fact, they have since gone—and that the whole of the present crews would be detained on board as care and maintenance parties.

There was yet another view of the Firth when the winter night thickened through the star-masking mists, and the darkness upon the water was like the night of the blind. For four years and more no ray of light had assailed that blackness, save when some fighting ship gesticulated with the long arm of her searchlight to a distant sister. But now the war that

BOARDING A GERMAN SUBMARINE.

EXAMINING A GERMAN COMMANDER'S PAPERS, ON BOARD AN EX-GERMAN SUBMARINE.

A GIANT U-BOAT--A SUPER-SUBMARINE.

darkened the world yielded like a conquered fleet; on November 22nd came the signal that anti-submarine precautions might be abandoned, as all the submarines were accounted for; and at the mouth of the Firth the night was freckled with the eyes of the ships. There were lights in long lines, in pinnacles, in clusters—leagues of lights making paths of beams on the water, lights that told unforgettably of the candle lighted that day in Britain and the world which shall never be put out.

IV.

THE END OF THE U. BOATS.

The surrender of the submarines—no handing over for internment this, but a final and absolute cession—commenced at Harwich on November 20th, the day before the great scene in

EX-GERMAN SUBMARINES AT PARKESTON QUAY, HARWICH.

U-BOATS MOVING TO MOORINGS OFF PARKESTON QUAY, HARWICH.

EX-GERMAN SUBMARINES.

CAMOUFLAGED CRUISER U-BOATS.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

the Firth of Forth. And if it lacked much of the overpoweringly picturesque and spectacular quality of the taking over of the Fleet, its significance as bearing upon the German defeat and the success of the Allies' anti-submarine war was almost greater. Captain Perle, engaged by the revolution, has revealed how Germany's hopes of a naval action above water which should destroy or cripple the British Fleet were brought to nought by the Battle of Jutland; and it was to her assassin-weapon, the submarine, that Germany looked thenceforward to slacken the noose of the blockade and re-establish her sea-power. The surrender of the submarines was for Germany the abandonment of her last hope.

AN EX-GERMAN SUBMARINE.

A U-BOAT ENTERING HARWICH HARBOUR FLYING THE WHITE ENSIGN.

THE NEWEST TYPE OF GERMAN MINE-LAYING SUBMARINE.

So much of the space inside the submarine is taken up by the mines and gear connected with them that the torpedo-tubes have to be fixed externally. The starboard tube can be seen above the conning-tower with a spare torpedo lashed abaft its breach.

U-BOAT MINE-LAYERS.

In the foreground, "U 117"; middle, "U 126"; outside, "U 126"; 59 guns.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

THREE U-BOATS WITH THEIR CREWS ON BOARD.

THE GERMAN BATTLE-SHIP "HELGOLAND," WITH SUBMARINE CREWS ABOARD.

ONE OF THE BIGGEST OCEAN-GOING SUBMARINES ALONGSIDE THE DEPOT-SHIP "PANDORA," AT HARWICH.

This type ("U 117-118") mount a 5.9 gun forward, and were specially designed to operate off the Azores and the American coast. They can carry a number of mines, as well as torpedoes.

THE STEEL CUTTERS LATTERLY FITTED ON MOST GERMAN SUBMARINES FOR THE PURPOSE OF CUTTING THROUGH OUR NETS.

The Triumph of the Royal Navy.

It was at 7.10 in the morning that Rear-Admiral Sir Reginald Tyrwhitt, waiting upon the rendezvous off Harwich in his flag-ship Cornwall, saw the first of the U-boats, flagless, her identification-number painted out, her hatch open, and her crew on deck, come stealing into sight, sliding out of a bank of mist like a rat from a hole in a wall, into the lane which the destroyers and light cruisers left open for her. Behind her the others followed, twenty in all—mixed types that varied from battered antiques, survivors of nearly four years of war, to the newest and most formidable type of submersible cruiser, scarcely three months old. All had painted out their numbers; many, perhaps, had records they were not willing to admit. They moved in a single line ahead, with some four hundred feet between each.

A GERMAN CREW ABOARD THEIR SUBMARINE.

RECEIVED IN SILENCE.

The second meeting-point, where the submarines were to be boarded by British officers and men for the run into Harwich, was between the Cork Light-ship and the South Cutler Buoy; and there Captain A. P. Addison, commanding the submarine depot at Harwich, awaited them with his destroyers. The mist had cleared somewhat by ten o'clock, as the submarines commenced to arrive, shepherded in by the British ships and the motor-launches, and the whole

A GERMAN SUBMARINE CREW.

GERMAN SAILORS ABOARD THE "FIREDRAKE" WAITING TO BOARD A HOSPITAL-SHIP
TO RETURN TO GERMANY.

APPROACHING THE TWO

fleet of them, strange shapes lying low along the water, was plain to see. With them were the two transports which were to convey the crews back to their own country; one of these, the Sierra Ventosa, carried the insignia of a hospital-ship.

The officers and men who were to board them and take them over stood watching while they moved into position. These were seamen who for years have worked against the German under-sea campaign, who know, as no others can know, all that tale of horror, of joy in cruelty and slaughter, of cowardice and treachery. Now had come the hour of their supreme triumph; across the dully-shining water, not a pistol-shot away, they saw their enemies, the men of the submarines, standing about the narrow decks of their craft, gazing, some gloomy and depressed; as many others, with that strange national psychology which finds no bitterness in shame, openly smiling and waving their hands. The British seamen watched them, and in silence; there was not a jeer, not even a cheer or a shout.

APPROACHING THE TWO

LINES OF U-BOATS.

HOISTING THE WHITE ENSIGN.

The motor-boats took the parties across to the submarines, and in each case an officer boarded first and saluted. "Your papers, please," was his formula for accosting the German commander, and not till those had been produced and examined, and an interrogatory regarding the ship's gear and armament concluded, did the bluejackets go aboard.

With them they took the White Ensign, and when the Germans who were still below, save those required at the engines, were sent on deck, it was to find the British naval flag already flying from periscope or wireless mast. The submarines had ceased to be German for ever.

A British officer then took command, though the German helmsman remained at the wheel; and, with the British prize-crew on the after-deck and the Germans herded forward, the long procession headed for the boom that guards Harwich harbour. By two o'clock, they were all berthed in tiers of three at the buoys off Parkeston.

LINES OF U-BOATS.